GENERAL.

Tallinn (Reval) — the capital of the Republic of Estonia — is situated between  $59^{\circ} 24'$  —  $59^{\circ} 28' 25''$  n. latitude and  $50^{\circ} 29' 5''$  —  $50^{\circ} 41'$  e. longitude, on the south coast of the Bay of Finland.

The total area of the town territory is about 5825 hectares. In 1927 the average temperature was 4.7 degrees C, the barometrical average 755.3 millimeters and the total rainfall, distributed over 187 days, amounted to 651.6 millimeters.

The harbour of Tallinn is open to navigation throughout the year.

The number of inhabitants is about 130.000, of which 84% are Estonians, 6% Germans, 6% Russians and 4% other nationalities.

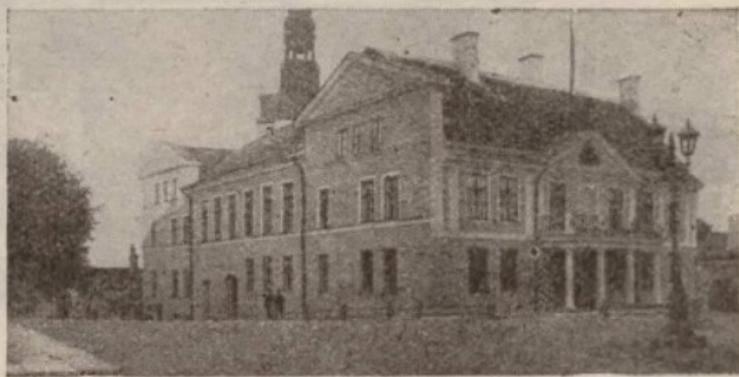

In respect of religion 83% were evangelical-lutheran, 13% Greek-orthodox, 1.6% mosaical and 0.8% Roman-catholic.

HISTORICAL SURVEY.

In the year 1219 King Valdemar II of Denmark, to whom Bishop Albert had applied for help against Russia, appeared on the coast of Estonia with a large fleet, destroyed the stronghold of the Estonians — Lindanisa — and in its place erected the Danish castle "Revele" (the great Castle on the Dome together with the Dome Church), which the Estonians afterwards called "Taanilinn" — the town of the Danes. The old chronicles have it that during the battle which took place near Tallinn on June 15th 1219, the "Danebrog", the Danish banner (a white cross in a field of red, the same as the so-called "small escutcheon" of the present day of the town of Tallinn), fell from the sky and helped the Danes to their victory over the Estonians. The "little castle", with the tower called "Long Herman", (Pikk Herman), was erected in 1227 by the Order of the Brothers of the Sword. At the foot of the Dome a borough came to exist and we may suppose that streets such as "Knight Street", (rüütel, Ritter), "King Street" (kuningas, König) and "Wheel-Well Street" (rataskaev, Rader) existed already about the year 1230. The Danish rule, with a short interruption, lasted till the year 1346. During this period the churches of the town were built such as the Dome Church (Toomkirik) (1219), the Church of St. Olaf (Olevistekirik) (mentioned in 1267), the Church of St. Nicolas (Nigulistekirik) (mentioned in 1316) and the Church of the Holy Ghost (Pühavaimukirik) (the former chapel of the town-council, mentioned in 1316). The oldest walls with which the town was girt also date back to this time.

Trade and commerce formed the occupation of the inhabitants. In 1248 the town was granted the "Lubian Right", that is, autonomy and self-jurisdiction. From this time the town began to flourish, the culminating point being reached during the time of the Hansa when the Order ruled the country (1346 to 1561). Here it should be pointed out that the Estonians made repeated efforts to regain their lost independence, but the revolts which occurred were suppressed by the foreign rulers. The bloodiest of these revolts was that of 1343, the "Jüriöö" (St. George's Night).

The Reformation commenced in Tallinn in the year 1524: the Dominicans were expelled the country, the Dome Church and the Church of St. Olaf were pillaged.

In the sixteenth century, when Poland, Russia and Sweden contended for domination on the shores of the Baltic Sea, the prosperity of Tallinn began to decline. Russia, having thrown off the Tartar yoke, in her thirst for conquest turned to the West. In the year 1570/71 Tallinn suffered a heavy siege by the hosts of Ivan the Terrible, repeated in 1577. Already during the period of Swedish rule (1561 to 1710), called by the Estonians "the good old Swedish times", the commerce of Tallinn fell away and the decline continued under Russian rule (1710 to 1918) up to the year 1870, when railway communication between Tallinn and Petersburg was opened.

In spite of their desperate resistance the Estonians had lost their independence in the thirteenth century and by the policy of their rulers, were compelled to forego all economic, political and cultural self-assertion. Only in the beginning of the nineteenth century, after the abolition of serfdom in 1816, did the national regeneration of the Estonian people set in, marked by such events as the formation of the first Estonian society, the "Estonia" (1865), the issue of the first Estonian weekly periodical (1875), the first Estonian singing festival (1880), all indications of increasing national self-consciousness. Hereafter national endeavour develops rapidly: the second Estonian singing festival (1896), the first daily newspaper (1901), municipal administration of Tallinn by the Estonians (1904), until at last, after the revolution of 1905, the World War and the second revolution of 1917, after the bolshevist times and German occupation, Estonia succeeded in regaining her independence. On April 23rd 1919 the Constituent Assembly met and after the long, bloody struggle of many nations Tallinn, once the primitive stronghold of the Estonian people, became the capital of the Republic of Estonia.

THE SIGHTS OF TALLINN.

The Town Hall, in the Town Hall Square (Raekoja plats), first mentioned about 1330, is the only town hall in the Baltic states of mediaeval date. Its tower was built later, in 1629. In the former Citizens' Hall, now the entrance hall, the portraits of Charles XI of Sweden and Queen Christina are hung. Here is also to be seen a bench dating from the 17-th century and a table of the times of Peter the Great. In the council hall will be found the back of a bench of the 15-th century, a carved coping dating from Swedish times and 8 lunette pictures by J. van Aken, representing biblical subjects, also valuable Flemish gobelins (1547). In the mayor's (linna-pea) room various precious old objects are kept, such as regimental batons, keys, weapons, trinkets, etc. On the ground floor the archives of the town are installed, rich in old books, manuscripts, and so on, bulls of the pope, letters of Martin Luther and other valuable documents.

Opposite the Town Hall is the old Public Scales (Vana vaekoda), built in the 16-th century. Passing through the Dunkri and Rataskaevu Street we come to the Church of St. Nicolas (Niguliste kirik), built in 1316. In the oldest part of the church, the Chapel of St. Anthony, the old altar of 1482, the altar of St. Anthony and the picture „Death's Dance“ of the 16-th century, are remarkable.

At the end of the Rüütlili Street is the Swedish Church of St. Michael (Rootsi kirik, 16-th century), presented to the Swedish parish in 1733. After taking a look at the imposing old tower „Kik in de Kök“, we return through the Rüütlili Street and reach the Lühike jalg. Mounting the flight of steps, we pass through the old „Swedish Gate“ (Rootsi värvav)

On our left we notice the house of the President of the State (Riigivanem) and in front of us stands the Cathedral of Alexander Nevsky, erected by the Russians in 1900 as a visible sign of their rule. The obtrusive splendour of this structure is hardly in keeping with the grand old buildings which form its surroundings. Opposite the Cathedral is the "Castle", the front wing of which was built in 1788. In the courtyard is still to be seen the old castle-wall and the high old tower, nicknamed Long Herman (Pikk Hermann). On our right is the House of the State Assembly.

Going along Dome School (Toomkooli) Street we come to the oldest church of Tallinn, the Dome of St. Mary's (Toomkirik, mentioned in 1233). It burnt down three times, in 1433, 1553 and 1684. There are two noteworthy tombs in this church:

To the right of the church is the former Ritterhaus, now the Foreign Ministry (Välisministeerium) and the Dome Museum, containing many ethnographical and archeological collections.

If we now turn into the Rahukohtu Street and then pass through the court-yard of the courts of justice, we shall come to the top of a flight of steps called the Patkul Stairs leading down the steep mountain. This point gives us a splendid view of the town and the sea beyond.

Further on is the Church of St. Olaf (Olewiste kirik) mentioned in 1267, containing the Bremen Chapel. The steeple is 130 meters high; it has been struck by lightning six times and the church burnt down three times — the last time in 1820. On the wall of the church, in Pikk Street, is a cenotaph (1513) erected by H. Paulsen. Going down Pikk Street towards the sea, we come to the Strand Gate (Rannawärv) and the tower called "Fat Margaret" (Paks Margareeta) built in 1539 and demolished

Nearly opposite, a little farther on, is the Exchange and the Great Guild (1407 to 1410) and opposite this the Church of the Holy Ghost (Pühavaimukirik) 1316. Up to 1889 it served as the chapel of the town council, now it belongs to an Estonian congregation.
